Television, the internet, and traditional media often show pictures of children caught in the middle of warring factions. The pictures are different but ultimately the same. The children are often scared, sometimes hurt; many times just staring into space, seemingly devoid of emotions. What goes through their minds? How do children see war? What wisdom is hidden behind those blank stares?

Children need to play—it is a necessary component of growing up sanely, even in a world gone mad. How do they manage to play in the middle of all that violence and terror? And where does play end and horror of reality begin?

As a child I was caught in the backwaters of greatest war humanity has ever experienced. In my Playwar trilogy I want to lead you in the search of answers to those essential questions through a candid account of my own experiences.

The time is the crucial years (1942-45) when the tide turned in World War Two and the worst of mankind's animal instincts was unleashed. The place is a no-man's-land in the central mountains of Northern Italy. There were four of us kids; we all survived—perhaps because most of the madness we turned into a playwar. In the cast of the character that populated our games there were, as there should be, heroes and villains—but they were not all on one side or the other, they were of all breeds and nationalities.

In the first volume I connect those old memories to more recent ones involving my own children, who have never experienced war, and walk them through the gathering storm from 1942 to 1944. In the second volume I cover the winter of 1944-45 when desperation and hate reached depths unfathomable by civilized people who have not experienced war at close hand. The last volume describes the emergence of many of the survivors into a time of peace, as they try to shed that huge baggage of despair they had accumulated in four years of trouble. The subtitles refer to the fact that war is hell, and in the Italian literary tradition Dante's Divine Comedy describes the poet's travel through hell, from the infamous gate that intimates: "leave all hope, ye who enter," turn by turn all the way to its very bottom before escaping the horror and hope for salvation through Purgatory.

This is the plan. I hope you, my reader, may want to take the trip with the aid of my narrative.
