The journey we all wish we could take . . . then and now. Benson Lamb shares his experiences on the road in a simpler time, when Americans could travel comfortably in the Muslim world and partake of the cultures that made the East so exotic and tantalizing. Along the way, we learn about what was going on at home and abroad and how those events shaped the world then and now. Imagine a time and place when phones were tethered to walls, money had to be 'wired', you could travel on less than $5 a day and you might be confronted by bandits. The author brings us back to a world many imagined but few have experienced. A welcome change of pace from our hyper-connected present day reality. This writing contains discussion of drugs and drug taking.
