When a giant outhouse floats down the river to your house, the only reasonable course of action is to build a raft from it and take it down the Washita. Young brothers Cotton Top and Earnest do exactly that, but they'd never have guessed where else they might go because of that raft.

The sons of sharecroppers in 1950s Oklahoma, Cotton Top and Earnest spend their days milking cows, tending the garden, and fighting off snakes. Cotton Top looks out for his younger brother Earnest, but it's not easy to stay out of trouble.

Cotton Top is curious, and Earnest always finds a way. They go to school, try to talk to girls, play sports, and run a sneaky little gamble on the side. The spring storms routinely swell the Washita River, and the boys scavenge for prizes. Mismatched boots, some clothes, a four-stall outhouse. The river even sends them a dog who saves their lives more times than they count. These adventurous youths hear the river calling, and the outhouse gives them the core material they need to start building their raft.

To save money for the trip, they breed rabbits for neighbors and sell snake rattlers to city folk. When the outhouse finally becomes a raft, Cotton Top and Earnest set off with friends on a rafting adventure that develops into a coming-of-age path leading to local fame and lasting life lessons. They encounter gold miners, wild boars, and criminals while they're being trailed by a mysterious horseman. These enterprising brothers travel through Sulphur, Russet, Lake Texoma, and many places between, but will they come home the same boys who set off on their adventures?
