Words are essentially sound. That, and whatever we make them mean. But, mostly, language is sound dispersed in time. Like music. And we listen.

Words signify. Mediate. We commerce with meanings. We connect. Only connect. Words give voice a shape. Voice is existence. Being in time.

The works contained in this anthology speak to me in ways that their young authors would never think of. A compilation of poetry, short stories, and essays, the present volume edited by the Central Writers Publishing Board will fascinate the reader because, like all great literary creation, it is meant not only to be read, but to be heard.

It speaks. It sings.

The anthology, Literature at Stop 20 unfolds with a sense of urgency that stems from a need to reconstruct the world. That is the job of a writer, after all: to create an order out of a previously and seemingly given disorder. In unison, these poems and stories trace the complex topography of the soul. They resemble a collective mural, a collage of myriads, a motley gathering of love, courage, pride, and determination that interact with the sense of nothingness, fear, and concern for the actual state of the world. These students? Call them warriors. Call them poets. They fight back.
