Originally intended for the readership of young children verging on their teen years, this book decided instead to take on a life of its own. The consequence was that grannies, mums and anyone with a fondness for determined women and their offspring are more likely to appreciate the result. At least, that's been the reaction of volunteer readers prior to publishing. Sometimes, when writing a novel, the characters escape the imagination of the author, leaving him/her to be more a spectator than a scribbler. Although mildly bizarre, as in the case of this novel, it can be quite a pleasant experience for the writer, since it offers surprise from not quite knowing what comes next. We first meet Patricia and Marcus when they are both seven years old, living in different parts of London. Respectively nicknamed Pasta and Milo, the children eventually discover each other as neighbours following their parents' decision to move to a small and remote hamlet in the countryside. The immediate opportunity for many adventures is obvious, especially as redheaded Pasta, feisty and full of imagination, is unconstrained, competing to outdo proud Milo. Their close friendship, formed on the back of squabbles, disagreements and daring takes a new turn when, following a bicycle accident, they befriend the homeless man who comes to their rescue. This man, something of an enigma for his kindness and many talents, attracts the affection of the Pasta and Milo families and many others. The story traces their discrete efforts to uncover his history and to restore him to the happy life he once knew. Love lost and gained, crime busting, military life, aviators, an escaped herd of cows, school bullies and an offshore emergency in Brittany are among a raft of episodes that keep Pasta and Milo on their toes and serial winners.
