As a country, Australia faced a tough end to 2019 and a brutal start to 2020, with bushfires affecting so many families and our beautiful wildlife. We witnessed a country coming together to help one another, dedicated emergency-service workers and volunteers all striving to make a difference. And yet, when the last fire was extinguished, another important job began: rebuilding communities. Many of the communities affected were tourist towns – places that usually have a boost in income over the summer holiday period, but not this year. There’s a simple way we can all help now and that’s by taking our tourist dollars to these regions. In this issue, we’re sharing plenty of ideas for accessible holidays across Australia.

In accessible tourism news, last year I enjoyed travelling to San Francisco for an accessibility conference. It was interesting to hear speakers from various US destinations sharing how they are striving to make their destinations inclusive and welcoming to people of all abilities. Visit Mesa was a standout, with its successful project to become the first autism-certified city in the US. We need to continue to share ideas and examples across the globe to improve inclusion within the tourism industry.

At Travel Without Limits, we are proud to have contributors from across the world bringing you stories from their travels. Style of travel, budgets and challenges when travelling may vary between contributors, but each has a passion for travel and a determination to make it happen. This issue we have contributors from the US, Europe, Ireland, Canada and, of course, Australia.
